Statement of Significance

Last updated on -

What is significant?

The area was first mapped and designated the Gold Commissioner's Camp by Captain Wright in 1851 after the discovery of gold along Barkers Creek. The site contained a number of significant administrative and police buildings, including the post office and treasury. The area was known to have some police buildings, including stables and barracks within the boundary as well. In 1861 Section 117B was reserved for public purposes and the camp buildings were subsequently repurposed. The site was used as a parade ground for the Volunteer Rifle Corps, and in the 1870s became the home of the Castlemaine Agricultural Show. The reserve has been subject to minor developments throughout the twentieth century but has been predominantly used by the public as a recreational reserve.

How is it significant?

The site is of historical, archaeological and social significance.

Why is it significant?

The site is of historical significance as the location of a key government establishment during the years of the Victorian goldrush – one of the most significant rushes in world history. The site is of archaeological significance due to its potential to contain artefacts, deposits and features that relate to the establishment and operation of the camp, and other later 19th century activities. The place is also of social significance to the community of Castlemaine who have an understanding and appreciation of the history of this place as a focus of activities during the key years of the goldrush, and through their associations with later civic activities and celebrations.
